

THE RESIDUE OF GOD and AFTER THE WAITING ROOM

Kimiko Hahn

---

THE RESIDUE OF GOD

Aristotle wrote in his History of Animals
that, while higher forms reproduce,

the lower ones are not produced from animals at all,

but arise spontaneously:

some out of the dew which falls on foliage. . .
others in putrefying mud and dung, others

in residues—whether voided or still within the living animals.

Pliny and Virgil accepted Aristotle's theories

as well as, centuries later, Sir Frances Bacon.

So this is how belief originates:
something springs from waste and grand philosophers and theologians and biologists believe in magic or miracle—

till the 1660s when the Florentine court physician, Francesco Redi, constructed experiments to disprove

the equivocal generation of insects.

(And this is what I love though I am not exactly sure why—) Procuring the putrifying carcasses of buffaloes, tigers, lions, oxen, pigs, frogs, snakes,

and birds of various species—Redi incubated chunks of their meat

in large glass flasks, while several large fish decomposed in fetid water with the results that the same maggots swarmed within the tissue of each one disproving that certain animals spontaneously generate from certain kinds of decayed matter. Meanwhile, Redi noticed the large bluebottle flies attracted to his rank experiments, and set up lumps of meat, exposed or under nets, noting later that no larvae developed in the covered containers.

He concluded that where there were eggs

from those same flies.

And in 1668 he published these findings

THE RESIDUE
OF GOD

Kimiko Hahn

*

in Esperienze Intorno alla Generazione Degli Insetti. For myself, I am delighted by bluebottle flies and lumps of rancid flesh and experiments.

I am even more delighted that illustrious patriarchs who were right about a few things—and certainly produced texts of immeasurable beauty—were wrong. Completely wrong.

That Redi used common sense to see beyond the invisible and with diligence and luck, he proved them wrong—

*

I love that. I even love that Redi, himself, despite his earlier success,

admitted that gallflies in fact spontaneously generated because if things like an organ or eggs cannot be seen do they exist?

Which brings us up to date to scientists in the Sudan.
Here water contaminated with the Guinea worm infects the drinker

*

and the ingested parasite roils within the viscera at times for over a year until at three feet in length it produces a welt at an exit point slowly traveling out of the victim who may not tug at it lest he or she breaks a piece off and the remains calcify into a terrible deformity.

So, the child, say, must live with the parasite until it worms its way out quite literally.

But, because the larvae in the corrupted waters cannot be seen the Sudanese healers suggest that the infected must be cursed by God ignoring the scientists who cite civil war as barriers to purification.

The invisible continues as immaculate conception or damnation even while scientists compare the DNA of worms

with that of humans
to prove what we already believe about evolution;

or how aspirin or the unconscious works,

or how cells mutate and kill. And until recently,
what a giant squid looks like, whole.

AFTER THE
WAITING ROOM
Kimiko Hahn

AFTER THE WAITING ROOM

— a dentist speaks to her patient who thinks to herself—

A root canal. You have time now?
The nerve is mush.
Is that poetry? “In the Waiting Room”?

*Bishop. Linger in l’écriture feminine I keep returning to American women—
I think I am aching.*

No rubber dam—cotton
Let me know if this hurts—

*That waiting room was full of arctics and overcoats—
she was a few days from seven—
what attention to language:
‘arctics and overcoats’—*

You’ll feel a pinch—

*—waiting. I was waiting —then interrupted their childhoods with an urgency to leave their father and the rooms we adjusted to a home as best we could:
lasagna and sundresses—
I craved—*

Headphones? No?
This takes longer—about six minutes.
How are the girls?
I think of you sometimes—

*—the girls. For them to be daughters.
To be the daughter means what?*

(Elizabeth could read.)

I’ll be back in a few minutes.

*What about that photo she saw in that yellow magazine for the intellectually-timid middle class,
the prurient puritans?
What about the inevitable
male vantage—the ghastly (would black, 1918, be other than ghastly and glorified—) hanging breasts like*

*that volcano
like that ‘long pig’
on a pole—*

*what about the urge for a child to see with her own eyes
photographs complicated
by armchair colonialists?*

Are you okay?

*What of Elizabeth, of Aunt Consuelo—of their bodies?
of my body, my sister’s and mother’s?*

AFTER THE
WAITING ROOM
Kimiko Hahn

You okay? Feel anything?

*Wasn't her 'oh!' a jouissance—
a call, a cry, a coming of age outburst—*

as well as vertigo?

Feel anything?

*I recall that blue-black space:
eight, feathery hair already covering my skin in private places
and breasts the feel of fat—
the dark living room with one light spotting my mother on the brown sofa,
my father and sister absent,
my mother telling me, 'Someday blood will suddenly leak from your body.'
The air around me
full of dots, felt steep, like Elizabeth. Like her waiting room.*

Irrigate. Now I'm flooding the nerve ending.
Wider.

*My mother didn't know
I was so empty I was falling into myself.
Falling away from her.
I recall the steep. Steeping.
I was steeping. Why couldn't she see the fall so deep nothing showed across my tiny face.
So warm. Full of swarmy dots.
Elizabeth's blue-black falling.*

*Her instruments placed on my chest
are cold.*

Rinse please.

*In Maui my mother told my sister,
'Kimi can't swim today.' That was that.*

Puff of air.
Bonding

*In Maui my mother told my sister,
'Kimi can't swim today.' That was that.*

Number thirty file—not rotary, the hand file.
A foul smell.
Tell me if it hurts.

Glad your girls are good.
I think of you sometimes. The pain.

Puff of air.
Bonding.

Bonding. Craving—

Pressure. A bracket.
I need an impression.
Bite down. Stay still.

*I need your impression—
Elizabeth—did you go to Brazil
for jouissance? Can it be painful?
Can it be a momentary stay
from longing?*

AFTER THE
WAITING ROOM
Kimiko Hahn

---

Not long.
Syringe.

*Her gloved hands are so gentle.
I wasn't graceful with my own girls—
how to tell daughters,
I crave to be a mother
but I need to leave home first?
How ask forgiveness
so they'd follow me
to a little apartment above Blanca's Dress Shop?
How to tell daughters about the joyful fluttering—it's fun—but don't.
Or, it's fun but don't but if you do,
protect yourself—*

How to protect—

Hold still. This will taste bitter.
Now fumes from the heat.

Hand me the—

Rinse. Yes.

How does a mother safeguard daughters?

It was night. The War was on.

You all right?
You'll feel tender for a few days.

*Bishop says it's all right.
Someone is my mother.*

Oh, I can read her poem straight through.

You can go now.

Kimiko Hahn is the author of eight books of poetry, including The Narrow Road to the Interior, The Artist's Daughter, Mosquito and Ant, and Toxic Flora, which is due out from W.W. Norton in May 2010. Her many honors include the American Book Award, the Lila Wallace-Reader's Digest Award, two NEA grants, and two NYFA grants. She lives in New York City and is a professor at Queens College.